

THE BOTTLED WASP POCKET DIARY 2019

THE BOTTLED WASP POCKET DIARY 2019

Welcome to the 2019 Bottled Wasp Pocket Diary, a fundraising project in aid of the Anarchist Black Cross network and other groups involved in the prisoner support arena. All monies raised either go directly to prisoners themselves or to projects that offer them direct practical support. No funds make their way into lawyers' pockets or get spent on court fees.

Each year we uncover a new area of our hidden collective history and in this edition, our seventh, we turn our attention to us – ordinary rank-and-file anarchists – those amongst us who don't write best-selling theoretical works or gain notoriety from acts of bravado or good old-fashioned stupidity.

Sadly it now looks like this will be the final edition of the Bottled Wasp. Each version requires a great deal of time and effort to properly research and then to lay out, and over the past few years it has become something of a one-person operation, despite on-going efforts to recruit new collaborators, and it is no longer feasible to continue in that fashion. However, you should keep your eyes open for two future projects – a Biographical Dictionary of Anarchists and a Bottled Wasp website, both based on the large database that we have built up in recent years.

• • • • •

We dedicate this edition to our dear friend and fallen comrade Anna Campbell (b. 1991), who was killed in a Turkish air strike on Afrin in the Kurdish autonomous region of Rojava in northern Syria on March 18, 2018. Rest in Power Anna.

"Anarchists are opposed to violence; everyone knows that. The main plank of anarchism is the removal of violence from human relations... We are therefore enemies of the State which is the coercive violent organisation of society." - Errico Malatesta.

A NOTE ON DATES: The continued use of the Julian Calendar in countries covered by the Russian & Ottoman Empire leads to some confusion over the dating of events. Most Catholic countries changed the Julian [Old System = O.S.] to the Gregorian [New System = N.S.] Calendar in 1582 (when a papal bull of February 1582 decreed that 10 days should be dropped from October 1582, so that October 15 should follow immediately after October 4). However, the change did not occur in Russia & the Soviet Union until 1918, & other late adopters included Albania (1912), Bulgaria (1916), Romania & Yugoslavia (1919), Greece (1924), and Turkey (1927).

Joseph Conrad has a lot to answer for. His portrayal of the cartoonishly unlikeable 'anarchists' in his 1907 novel 'The Secret Agent' was both malicious and, one has to say, wilfully ignorant – this despite Conrad's claims to have researched his subject. Nor was it particularly original, in that he was following the well-established tradition of demonising "the other", in this case the anarchist immigrants with their unpalatable politics – be they 'bombers' or otherwise – who had arrived in Britain from Eastern Europe. This is somewhat ironic given that Conrad was himself an Eastern European immigrant, even if he had so successfully assimilated the language and culture as to have been said to have been "more English than the English". The novel is doubly damaging, when one considers that it remains the likely source of many people's first encounter with a depiction of anarchist ideology and practice.

Conrad's inspiration for the novel was an incident on February 15, 1894, when a French anarchist named Martial Bourdin blew himself up in Greenwich Park close to the Royal Observatory in London – believed by police to have been his intended target. In the novel, the central character, Adolf Verloc, an agent provocateur in the pay of Mr Vladimir, the First Secretary in the embassy of an unnamed Eastern European country, is tasked with carrying out a random act of terror in order to provoke a police crackdown on his country's émigré anarchists. Verloc then tricks his disabled brother-in-law Stevie into carrying the bomb that, like Bourdin's, explodes prematurely, killing him. Thus neither the organiser of the bombing nor the person blown up are in fact anarchists, whilst Conrad himself later claimed that the only "true anarchist" in the book was Verloc's wife Winnie, as she is "the only character who performs a serious act of violence against another", thereby illustrating Conrad's total lack of understanding of anarchism and anarchists – this after his having spent time and effort researching the writings of Peter Kropotkin and Mikhail Bakunin prior to writing 'The Secret Agent'.

Even though the novel is based on real events, it still manages to repeat the then widespread conflation of a number of disparate political movements that spanned different continents and had, at one time or another, chosen the tactic of propaganda by deed and the use of the attentat (attack), though with very different ends in mind. Thus the Russian Narodniks¹, such as Zemlya i Volya (Земля и Воля/Land and Liberty) and Narodnaya Volya (Народной Воли/People's Will), or the various Socialist-Revolutionary organisations, who were all regularly misidentified as being nihilists², had their actions at various times misattributed and placed under the general catch-all of 'anarchist'. Equally, nationalists such as Gavrilo Princip³, the Bosnian Serb assassin of Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria and Duchess Sophie Chotek of Austria in 1914, continue to be misidentified as being anarchist(s) for much the same reason.

That is not to claim that propaganda by deed was not practiced as an insurrectionary tactic by some anarchists of the period. Indeed, the tactic had been adopted at the July 1881 International Revolutionary Socialist Conference in London "to supplement spoken and written propaganda" in light of the widespread repression of the various revolutionary movements across the globe. In a feudal Russia, where widespread pogroms were forcing the mass movement of peoples to Western Europe and the New World, where all power lay in the hands of the Tsar, change was seen to be impossible by any other means. Europe, by contrast, had already witnessed the upheavals of the French Revolution and its rulers were still reeling from the events of the 1871 Paris Commune. However, with the continent still in the thrall of the powerful influence of the Church and much of its working population remaining illiterate, the attentat was seen to be the most effective form of propaganda then available. The United States was a different matter altogether: it remained Wild West-like, where its robber barons – worshippers at the new church of capital – sought to conquer the continent once more, this time in a battle against organised labour instead of its native peoples. There, all forms of dissent – be they anarchist, communist, socialist, trade union, etc. – were lumped together under one label, 'Reds', to be demonised and eradicated at all cost. On all three continents the weapon of insurrectionary change had long been the bullet and 'regicide' (of kings, presidents or prime ministers). However, through the actions of Santiago

1. Who Karl Yundt, the "old terrorist", (as depicted on our cover) appears to represent.

2. The Professor's politics are much closer to those of nihilism than anarchism.

3. Like Stevie, Princip was manipulated, in his case by Serbian army intelligence.

Salvador, Ravachol, Auguste Vaillant, Émile Henry⁴ and others, the bomb had become an increasingly popular choice of insurrectionists. In Britain things were somewhat different. True, there was still the battle of vested interests against an increasingly organised workforce, and the fear of contagion from continental Europe was still very much at the forefront of the thinking of the political classes. Yet the threat of the so-called anarchist bomber was virtually nonexistent this side of the English Channel.⁵ That did not stop the Metropolitan Police's Special Branch from inventing their own anarchist bomb plot. In 1892, Inspector William Melville used an agent provocateur, Auguste Coulon, to entrap six unsuspecting anarchists from Walsall in the West Midlands. They were charged with bomb-making and, in spite of evidence of their innocence, four were found guilty and sentenced to between six and ten years' penal servitude. Coulon would later serve as a partial inspiration for Conrad's Adolf Verloc, as would Melville for the novel's Chief Inspector Heat character.

As a final footnote to 'The Secret Agent', wannabe anarchist Ted Kaczynski – aka the Unabomber – was obsessed with the book, idolising the Professor character. And, just like the Professor, it was Kaczynski's nihilistic mission to single-handedly destroy society in order to rebuild it anew by targeting symbols of science and technology⁶ – one man against the rest of the world, whatever the consequences.

However, unlike Ted Kaczynski, the Professor and the other characters in Conrad's book, anarchists tend not to be obsessive loners who are incapable of co-operating with others, hiding away as they seek to bomb their way to some sort of utopian fantasy. Instead, we are builders and carers: the people who teach your children, who treat your illnesses, drive your trains, deliver your milk, work for NGOs, and volunteer in war zones, risking life and limb to help others. We are mothers, fathers, daughters, sons, queers, straight, trans, etc., and we are all the colours of the rainbow . . . including black.

4. The Bourdin explosion took place just three days after Henry's Café Terminus bombing.

5. Of the approximately one hundred bombing incidents on mainland Britain between 1881-1900, only three were "officially" attributed to anarchists, one somewhat dubiously.

6. Another theme in common with the book.

FRANCESC FERRER i GUÀRDIA

Francesc Ferrer i Guardia is a towering figure of free non-secular education, one who took on the two most powerful forces in his homeland Catalonia at the beginning of the C20th – the Roman Catholic church and the Spanish state, and whilst he may not have won in any conventional sense (he was after all executed by the Spanish state), his ideas spread across the world and still hold an important place in the heart of all those who wish their children to grow up and be educated in an environment free from the indoctrination of secular and non-secular bodies. His ideas also continue to inform the wider anarchist and libertarian discourse.

Ferrer was born on January 14¹, 1859 in the village of Alella, about twenty kilometres from Barcelona, into a well-to-do god-fearing, Catholic and monarchist peasant family. However, Francesc fell under the influence of one of his uncles, a fervent anti-clerical republican, and his appalled parents sent him away at the age of 14 to Barcelona to work in the store of a textile merchant friend of the family in the hope of repairing his ways. Unfortunately for them, that friend also turned out to be a Republican and ardent anti-clerical and, at the night classes he encouraged Ferrer to attend, he quickly became influenced by the republican, federalist and internationalist ideas of Francesc Pi i Margall. Thus, by the age of twenty he had declared himself a Republican and anti-clerical and, with the wages he saved, he had managed to pay for an exemption from military service and completed his project of learning French, the language of enlightenment.

On July 30, 1878, Ferrer started full-time work as a conductor on the Barcelona to Cervera de la Marenda (on the French border) railway line. By that time, Ferrer had also become a member of the Partido Republicano Progresista and was working with the PRP leader Ruiz Zorrilla, using his position to smuggle political refugees into France. In 1884, Ferrer joined the Freemasons, the traditional haven for liberal thought and political conspiracy in Spain, and that April he was involved in a failed insurrection in Santa Coloma de Farners, something that led to his quitting his job in May 1885 and being forced into exile in Paris with his wife and three children.

1. Commonly and erroneously cited as being Jan. 10th.

The first years in Paris for Ferrer were ones of poverty and struggle, but during his free time he read libertarian authors and established a close friendship with the anarchist Charles Malato. In 1889, his life changed when he started giving Spanish lessons, freeing him up to pursue his anarchist and freethought activities and, in 1892, he participated in the Congreso Universal de Librepensamiento (Universal Congress of Freethought) in Madrid.

Now viewing himself as an acrata, a philosophical anarchist, he turned his thoughts to addressing the reasons why Spain was not ripe for revolution: nearly 70 percent of his compatriots being illiterate, the education of the rest miserable and overshadowed by the Catholic church. So, taking advantage of a large inheritance (more than one million francs) from an elderly former student, he returned to Barcelona and, in September 1901, opened the Escola Moderna, ironically, in a former convent. Run on explicitly (though not openly) anarchist lines and Ferrer's own five pillars – diversity, social equality, the transmission of rational education, autonomy and mutual aid – the Escola Moderna quickly attracted the wrath of the government and the clergy, who aspired to only one thing, to close it. This they managed to do in the wake of a bloody attack on the wedding procession of King Alfonso XIII by Mateu Morral, a librarian in the Escola Moderna. This provided the authorities with the excuse they needed, even though Morral had denounced Ferrer for his opposition to atentados. Ferrer spent more than a year in Madrid's Model Prison, but was finally acquitted on July 19, 1907. Attempts to reopen the Escola Moderna proved futile and he moved to France and then Belgium.

In early July 1909, fighting flared up in Morocco and the Spanish government mobilised the army and its largely working class reservists. This provoked the Revolució de Juliol general strike on July 28, which was sadly crushed within days. Ferrer, who had had no part in the revolt, but was back in the country visiting his sick sister-in-law and niece, was arrested and accused of being its main instigator. Condemned to death by a Consell de guerra, he was shot in the moat of the castell de Montjuïc on October 13, 1909, a martyr to the principles of freethought and rational education.

Rootin

"... one wing of his faded greenish Havelock thrown back cavalierly over his shoulder ... The old terrorist, raising an uncertain and clawlike hand, gave a swaggering tilt of a black felt sombrero shading the hollows and ridges of his wasted face. An extraordinary expression of underhand malevolence survived in his extinguished eyes."

Joseph Conrad - 'The Secret Agent' (1907)
